A CORRESPONDENT has very kindly favoured us with the following notes of an excursion he has lately made into the Kwang-tung

EXCURSION INTO THE KWANG-

TUNG PROVINCE.

The San-hing stream joins the West River, between the two pagodas immediately opposite Shing-hing-fu; a strong current runs down to half-a-mile from its mouth, where the water commingles with that which is kept back by the higher level of the west River. For the first 30 or 40 li the stream is deep, and passes on both sides close to the foot of hills 500 or 600 feet high, the foot of the curvatures however conceal small tracts of cultivated land.

On the west bank is the village of Shánhau, a miserable collection of mud huts, very conspicuous because situated on the steep slope of a hill. Fifty li up, on the west bank, is the market town of San-kin, on a small plain, but I have formerly seen a market day, a large collection of people ten li below San-kin, the river widens to 200 or 250 feet, and shoals accross the stream, and the water is coriolis; sand is drawn over ridges of sand and the boat is drawn enough to float her into Chuan-kin the sand increases and the river continues to shoal; the boat is constantly drawn half afloat along the ground, and sometimes has to wait till a channel is cut for her to pass through. Zigzag is the course from this up; now on this side of the river, now on that, now in two or three feet water, now stuck fast; slow, very slow progress is made.

Thirty li above San-kin is the small market town of Lu-ku, and some 20 li above that is another small market town called Ché-kou, both on the west bank of the river. Twenty li above that again is the market town of Tung-hau, which is situated on the point where the river forks. All these places are small, but appear, on market days, to be the centres to which the people of the surrounding country congregate to buy and sell their produce.

As Tung-hau is approached the river bed becomes to nearly a quarter of a mile, and the stream of clear water meanders along sometimes in tortuous channels, and sometimes spreading out in shoal patches; the surrounding country also becomes less hilly, though still there are hills of 200 or 300 feet in height here and there, and more lofty elevations are visible in the distance to the S.E.

Until Tung-hau is approached the country shows signs neither of a large population nor of the means of supporting one.

On the banks of the river, at the time of the year following, the river is often converted into vegetable beds, but the quantity growing and the quality of the produce, and the fact that the river is often converted into

to float in; it is however sometimes used as a means of transit in small boats to the East Gate of the city of San-hing. The delta is protected from the summer risings of the river by a dyke some 8 feet in height, and, apparently owing to long cultivation and this protection from river currents, its soil is more of a clayed than a sandy character; sweet potatoes are grown on it, but they have a weak sickly look; Sugar, however, is grown to better perfection, and most of the land bears paddy in summer, more than sufficient for local use, for even now many boats are seen going down the river laden with that grain.

The dyke of the Eastern stream forms the road from Tung-hau to San-hing, a distance of 2½ English miles. The city is entered by the North Gate, an archway through which a Canton chair would be to be lowered to enable to pass through.

Such is first impression, a large line would give a height of eight or ten feet. With paddy fields on both sides, there is nothing interesting on the route, which may be either walked or done in miserable mat-enclosed bamboo chairs, which are awkwardly carried on one shoulder by three bearers who seem to stagger under the load, and do their work so much worse than Canton bearers, as to inspire the uninitiated with a constant dread of being thrown out.

San-hing city bears resemblance to that of San-shui; its low walls are scarcely a mile in circuit, there are no guns or other signs of preparation for defence upon them, and the road on the top is so crumbled away as to afford no secure footing for men behind the parapet. It is pierced with five gates, the North, South, East, West and Literature Gates, the last and the South being within 60 yards of each other.

The only suburbs are on the South side, and they consist of a score of ancestral halls, a street half a mile in length of small houses. Within the city the usual space is occupied by official buildings, there are many ancestral halls, and very much space is occupied by fish ponds, which at this dry season of the year are anything but pleasant to look at, the water having a greasy green appearance; there is no small number of vacant spaces, and the few streets are composed of poor low-built houses; the others with bricks laid edgewise. Pigs feed in the streets, and the inhabitants have a poor appearance; not one is to be seen (except the Yamun Secretaries, &c.), wearing a long coat, and this forms subject for railway to the Cantonese. The people are by no means rude to the foreigner, and, though all came to see the first appearance of such a one in the city, only boys followed, and they in doubt the officials' predictions, and the people to observe due decorum. Cash is dear, a dollar only producing 800, and, though the provisions are nominally cheaper, this cost of the cash brings them to about the same price as at Canton. San-hing has its gambling houses and low brothels, which, especially the former, afford a considerable proportion of the official emoluments of this poor district.

One of the Chinese agents of the French Emigration House (Solelars) at Canton has a house here, indicated by posting at the door one of those bills which are seen in the Canton streets informing the people, among other of their prospects in Cuba, that slavery is not tolerated in that island.

They do not appear to engage, openly at least, many people; but the president of the College, an elderly man of the rank of kuan, states as a matter requiring no concealment, that last year the late magistrate (Chien) sent for allowed to be sent to the side-bodied Hakkas to be sold as pigs; and then expressed his opinion that this course was wise and proper, because it released the country of 1,000 fellow men, and saved the lives of 1,000 fellow men; the operation, he added, received a check from the indigent opposition of the Hakkas at thus having wives and families left destitute. Similar acknowledgements were made by Wong, in allusion to his former office in Hakkas, and

the lives of 1,000 fellow men; the operation,
